SATURDAY, DECEMBER 11.

A PROFESSOR in one of the American colleges has recently been lecturing on the condition of politics in that country, and he called upon the scholars to come into politics, whereby everything would be made prosperous and pure. Press critics on the professor are of the opinion that there is a great deal of nonsense written about the necessity of inducing men of high education, college professors, writers and orators to enter political life. Occasionally a scholar like Gladstone or a literary man like Disraeli may prove himself a statesman, but the great results that have been achieved in statesmanship have, as a rule, been the work of men who were in no sense scholars, but who were great in the possession of clear common sense and executive power. What is wanted in politics is the intelligence and experience of business men of integrity. The same qualities which fit a man to manage a business successfully fit him to be a legislator or a minister. The American people understand this well enough, and prefer a man like President Grant, for example, who cannot make a speech or write a review, to a popular orator or a writer of eloquent essays. The problem of the day in that country as elsewhere is how to bring business tact and business integrity into office. The scholar in politics may be to a certain extent ornamental, but he is by no means what the necessities of a country require. Scholarship, says the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle—is good, and its importance is in no instance to be reduced by any theory that may be presented; but at the same time it is the man that makes the man that is needed in scholarship and practical knowledge, so the two do not happen to be combined, there is but one choice. Mr. Sumner was one of the ablest men in the United States senate; but if the people had to depend on the legislation of such as he they would starve to death. Speeches and scholarship are not needed for practical purposes—in nine out of ten cases they are incubrances. Statesmanship means that which does the best for the greatest number and does it quickly. The hard-headed men, the small men, the men of our legislative assemblies, the men who know a dollar at sight and value it according to its exact worth, the men who have learned business by doing business—these are the men that are needed to make laws. There is such a thing as knowing too much, provided the brain thus visited hasn't the capacity to carry the lesser as well as the greater knowledge that falls to it. Statesmanship is not theory and oratory. It is not a search through the past and a groping through the future and after the infinite. It is the speech of Charles Sumner on the "negroism" and some other of the things attributed to President Grant—the most superb mass of nicely-rounded trash that ever fell from the lips of a scholarly idiot. What the people want and need is business. If it is scholarly so much the better; but they want legislation suited to their needs. One of these days we trust that everybody will be scholarly, so that the legislation which goes through ancient history in order to make bread cheap and money plenty will be appreciated; but at present this is exactly too much. A scholarly fool is just as much a fool as if he were not scholarly, so as the parties depending on him are concerned; and if a representative man, in politics or otherwise, knows enough to do that which is expected of him, and is rhetorical or otherwise, he is just as much the coming man as if he had had convulsions over the classics. For the fun of the thing, let the reader look over the list of successful men, from president down—in politics, in religion, in business and social matters—and see precisely what excessive scholarship amounts to. We by no means intend to lessen the importance of scholarship; but we do intend that gentleman elevates his scholarly chin above his scholarly cravat and proceeds to enlighten the public as to the salvation which depends solely upon him, it is time he began to learn something. As a rule, the thorough scholar is a thorough snob. A thorough scholar should teach him to be exactly the opposite of this; but you can't educate the snob as he is the brain, and foolishness is bred in the bone. There are two systems of education—the one a business affair that fits the young man for real life, and the other a groping after the impossible which can in no event, be entirely satisfied. Every one should have both; and if this is impossible he should have the one first mentioned. Success in life is the main thing, and the hereafter is pretty likely to take care of itself.

The full text of the complaint made of their wrongs to the international consular commission by the Herzogvians has been published. It sets forth that when the "aga," from whom a small farmer rents a piece of ground, visits his tenant, accompanied by a large retinue of attendants, the peasant has to entertain him and his followers, and provide for his horses, under pain of being scourged or thrown into prison. Farms in the Herzogvian empire have a fixed rent put upon them, but the owner, by collusion with the State officials, exacts ten times the amount which the law allows. In addition, the rayahs have to pay a personal and property tax, besides a military impost. If a Christian is proceeded against by a Turk, or if he appeals for justice against a Turk, he invariably is defeated unless he have two Turkish witnesses, and when he does not gain his point in prison. If a Christian bear witness against a Turk he only holds his life by a three days' tenure. The Muslims abhor the Greek and Catholic priests, the bells of their churches, and the images of their saints, and publicly insult and defile them. If a Turk complains before a tribunal the judgment is quickly rendered in favor of a Christian. A complaint, he may await judgment until the end of the world, unless he bribes the judge with ten times the amount of the object of litigation. In addition to these, the insurgent chiefs enumerate some fifteen other grievances equally oppressive, in reading which we only wonder that the provinces of which we have heard so much lately did not revolt sooner.

Sleep Following Supper.

["Spiridon" in Boston Saturday Gazette.]

I discussed the question recently with an able physician, who told me: "There is nothing more absurd than to pretend 'tis unhealthy to sleep immediately after the day's last meal. Is not man an animal? Do not animals, without exception, sleep immediately after eating? Do we not feel like sleeping after each day's meal? And is it not by that sleep that we shake off sleep? Evidently the body yearns for sleep. Exercise immediately after each meal is pernicious. Best is healthful. What rest can compare with sleep which reposes the mind, the lungs, even the heart? See the peasants. No person enjoys better health than they do. Suppose in the best meal of their day. No sooner have they supped than they go to bed. Look at the actors. There was Rubini. He dined at three, went to his dressing-room in the Italian Opera House and slept till the theatre opened its doors. At midnight he supped heartily, and straight to bed he went. He died of sheer old age. You know Monte Thiers' habit? The moment dinner ended he stretched himself out to sleep, and sleeps an hour. The truth is, if you look around you there will be found that the great majority of men go to sleep immediately after making their best meal. You certainly never saw anywhere in the world healthier women than those of the great markets. What is their rule of life? Dinner and to bed, the very another, the very opposite class—astronomers. They keep late hours. Their best meal is taken when the stars say, 'Good night.' Then they go to sleep. Did you ever hear of an astronomer dying? No! The majority of the majority of servants and mechanics go to sleep immediately after taking their best meal. They are right. They obey nature's voice, which always gives judicious counsel."

Kossuth is living in comfort at Barraconne, a village between Turin and Rivoli, absorbed in the cultivation of fruits, flowers, and vegetables, and keeping an eye on his collections of insects and minerals. Kossuth was seventy-three years old on the 16th of September.

A case came up for trial in a French court, and as the evidence was expected to be of a certain character, the judge intimated the fact and requested the decent men to withdraw. Not a soul moved. "Usher," said the judge, "now that all the decent women have withdrawn, turn the rest out!"

The British government is erecting for the Centennial Exhibition in Philadelphia, near Machinery Hall, two small buildings, half brick and half timber for the accommodation of members of the British Commission and British exhibitors. It will be in the Elizabethan or sixteenth century style of architecture, and the furniture will belong to the same period.

One of the provisions of the new Constitution proposed for North Carolina is the following: "No person who shall deny the being of God, or the truth of the Christian religion, or the authority of the Old or New Testament, or shall hold religious principles incompatible with the freedom or safety of the State, shall be capable of holding any office or place of trust or profit in the civil department within this State."
